PUBLIC SCHOOL
SUPERHERO

by James Patterson

Okay, in my neighborhood, my school is known as Fort Union. That's because of the crazy-strict military base rules there.

No kids get inside until 7:50 a.m. sharp.

No kids get inside without a student ID.

No kids get inside without opening their backpacks for the security guards.

And that's just the front door. I'm sure it'd take you less time to get through the airport's high-tech security with explosives tied to your calves. It's crazy man. This is what I go through, every stinkin' day.

When I get past security, I find that my homeroom doesn't even have real windows. It's just metal screens where someone broke out the glass over the summer.

Also, it's kind of crowded in here. „Overcrowded-“ would be an understatement. For real.

After attendance, my homeroom teacher, Ms. Green takes us around the school and shows us where everything is.

Downstairs on the first floor, the library's about the size of a closet. There's one rolling computer cart with two computers for the whole school.
